COMING HOME, COMING OUT

Why We Come Home

For as long as I can remember I have heard and read of an instinct in some species to return home, to conclude or complete their life’s journey on this planet where they began it. When I left Maine for the last time in 1981, I did so with the thought that I might one day, at least for a time, return. Come back home to Maine.

In the years since as a person with AIDS, living in the age of AIDS, I have learned that there has long been an underlying yearning (instinctive?) that one day I would come back home to Maine. It is this deep sense that has suggested to me that of all the journeys that life might hold for me, the journey back home would be the most important piece of a larger journey, the piece essential to making complete my life’s journey on this planet. I would have to come back home to Maine to confront and to find peace with all of the things, fears, conflicts and contradictions that once made it necessary, or maybe just desirable, to leave in the first place.

As people we all tend to leave home, in varying degrees. Gay and straight, the processes of growing up and self actualization result in distances between who and where we are and who and where we came from. The distances are measured in miles and years and in terms of personal and human attachments. There is, I believe in all of us, a piece of us that never quite fully leaves home. I call it the soul. Thus that underlying yearning to come home, to reconcile and make peace with our beginning, to touch base, so to speak. For some of us, and I think especially for lesbians and gays, it is to deal with all of the things that once made us run away.

If an AIDS diagnosis in 1986 didn’t make my journey home more compelling, it certainly made it more complicated. From early on I knew that whether in Maine or in Washington, DC, the never ending risks to employment, home security, physical safety and acceptability that had become just one of the realities of being a gay man, would now become even more real and more threatening. It was time to take another look at the closet that I had been dismantling, piece by piece, during the last 15 years of my life. That closet that had for so long provided a hiding place for a gay boy, and later a gay man in a straight man’s world. How now, would it be needed to hide a gay man with AIDS?

The process of "coming out" has never been easy, sometimes very difficult and sometimes dangerous, always very personal and always very liberating. Coming home again, at least for a time, has been an essential ingredient in the irreversible and never ending process of "coming out." It’s about coming out of that closet and one day, staying out of that closet, once and for all. But now that closet would take...
Dear APEX readers and editors:

I am impelled to write in response to three phrases that struck me in the April issue: p.1: "CHRISTIANS STRIKE SOUR NOTE," p.8: "national right wing organizations gather up 213 million dollars every year" becomes "money gathered by the Christian right," p.9: the threat is that the Christian Coalition is "doing training to elect Christian officials to office all over the state."

Many activities of the right wing activists who couch their racist, sexist or homophobic attacks in religious language have alienated a broad range of people. Operation Rescue, for example, with its terror tactics of sieges and invasions of abortion clinics, stalking of clinic staff members, and personal harassment of clinic patients, has come to be seen as a violator of elementary civil liberties and human rights. Feminists have learned that many of those who are repelled by Operation Rescue’s attacks may be Christians themselves, who are nevertheless willing to defend abortion clinics and the right of women to reproductive freedom.

If we generalize about those who promote hate as "the Christian right" we are really obscuring a clear view of our attackers. For one thing, there are many Christians who are deeply committed to and engaged in struggles for justice. We cut ourselves off from their support if we focus our counterattack on Operation Rescue’s or the Christian Coalition’s "Christianity." If we slip into defining all religion and religious believers as our enemies, we lose their help in isolating organizations like OR or the Christian Coalition.

But I think what’s at stake is more than that simple tactical issue. The chief danger from outfits like the Christian Coalition is their right-wing political agenda. It’s not their religious beliefs that we object to, it’s their attempt to regulate public life and our lives - in accordance with the agenda of the right wing that we want to stop. Their goals in public education, for example, include opposing sex education and condom distribution, including prayer, teaching creationism, and supporting private schools through a voucher system. And they are after similar changes in the areas of health care, taxation, welfare, the arts, environmental protection, as well as gender and racial equality.

My assumption is that a big majority in our country, including people who are religious and people who are not, are repelled by the hooligans of the anti-abortion protests and the gay-bashers. Many, if not a majority, defend women’s right to abortion and our civil rights as gay people, though they may be confused by rhetoric about "special rights." So let’s keep the focus of our resistance to the Christian Civic League, the Jasper Wymans, the Carolyn Cosbys and the rest of our local reactionaries on their politics not on their religious views, and build the strongest coalition we can to defeat them in Maine.

Dear Editor:

I am the woman who “makes the Lesbian-ACOA meetings in Brunswick happen.” This letter to you is prompted by changes which are affecting the existence of the meeting. The meeting happens because someone opens the door and makes the meeting space comfortable and welcoming for those who attend. The meeting has power and works because there are women at the meeting who share their strength, hope and recovery.

This meeting is open to all women. We draw ideas for recovery from Alcoholics 12-Step books. Please be aware that alcoholism in your family is not a requirement to attend a meeting. Women who were unhappy, out-of-control or desperately wanting their lives to be easier have benefited from this group when they made a commitment to attend regularly. Currently, only two or three women are attending the meetings and a few more are needed to help create a strong healing space. I encourage you, especially if you’ve been thinking about attending a meeting, to do so in the month of May. Without your support there will be no reason to continue the meetings.

I am also looking for someone with recovery experience to open the meetings, since I cannot be there every week. For more information about the meeting or to volunteer to open the meeting, please leave a message at (207) 725-5103. Thank you.

Hi APEXers:

I will soon be living as a woman! April will be an exciting, but also a lonely month for me, because when I take steps to live my life as a woman, I will lose my family. I feel the time has come for me to be the woman that I am. Sometimes I wonder why people hate me just because I want to be who I really am. Nature is the one who fucked up, I am just going to have the mistake fixed with surgery. Why is it people can’t accept transsexuals? I just want to be me and that’s being a woman! I have to live for two years before I can have the sex change surgery. In my mind I am female, I just have to get my body fixed to match my mind. I hope you can put this letter in APEX so people will know me and learn to accept me as a woman! Thank you.

Yours truly,
Claire Anne Cote

Dear APEX:

Portland’s Pride celebration will be quite different this year from past years. We will be holding a rally at Portland City Hall Plaza from 7 to 8pm on Friday, June 17. The speaker’s list is being formulated, with an effort to address the wide diversity and issues, as well as power, of our community. Prior to the rally, we are planning a "Tea" for speakers and press. Stonewall 25/Maine will hold a letter writing reception after the rally to promote the International Appeal for Human Rights.

On Saturday, June 18, Pride Day begins at 10:30 with opening ceremonies, music and ribbon cutting on Pine Street, near Longfellow Square. The Parade will be led by Maine’s Dykes on Bikes, a balloon arch, and the Stonewall 25/Maine float. Although the parade is a celebration, the route and timing is meant to insure visibility of the Portland community. Being visible can be enough to promote a hate crime, so we are asking that posters not suggest threats or dares to homophobes. Other than that, except in keeping with local ordinances, Pride will present Maine’s Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Drag or Transgendered communities as they wish to express their visibility.

The Festival begins at 1pm in Tommy’s Park. There will be three hours of entertainment at the top of the Old Port, Exchange Street. Entertainers will offer a broad range of musical tastes. (Additional performers are still being sought.) Across the street will be vendors, information tables and side shows in Old Post Office Park. There will be a women’s craft fair ongoing at the First Parish Church, and Women in Harmony is rumored to make an appearance for a mini-concert thereabouts. Later that evening, the Maine Gay Men’s Chorus will perform at the State Theater.

On Sunday, June 19, Pride continues with a "Bicycle Brunch" sponsored by Time Out. The weekend ends with More LETTERS ➔ page 10

by Naomi King

The last few months have seen the pornography debates spread across APEX's pages. Whether porn is right or wrong, whatever your personal definition of porn may be, we need, as a queer community, to take a reality check.

Anti-pornography feminists are arguing not just for boycotts of pornography, but for legislating, regulating, controlling, and, ultimately, banning pornography. The difficulty in generating these statutes, as both anti-porn feminists and the conservative right have found, is creating language general enough so that loopholes are difficult to find and thus all porn is banned, and yet specific enough to actually have an effect. The language settled upon involves two phrases: "community standards" and "demeaning to women." While at first review, these phrases may seem very democratic, reasonable, and just, in practice they do not work in any of the aforesaid ways.

Canada adopted an anti-pornography statute using community standards that further defined pornography as demeaning to women. This way, the anti-porn feminists felt, lesbian and gay publications would not be subjected to suppression, while hard-core heterosexual porn would be laid to rest. Yet the first and only ruling under this statute decided that under community standards a lesbian owned, lesbian oriented S&M magazine, Bad Attitude, was pornography because it was demeaning to women. This opened the doors for other queer publications to be deemed pornography. Not one heterosexual porn magazine - S&M or vanilla - has been challenged as porn. These are facts, not fantasies, about what this legislation and this anti-porn feminist movement accomplishes.

The community standards clause came about precisely because of the difficulty defining porn, which is actually how community standards of censorship of porn went into disarray. A number of court cases throughout this century, as excellently documented by Edward de Grazia, Girls Lean Back Everywhere: The Law of Obscenity and the Assault on Genius (New York: Random House, 1992), have challenged the laws of obscenity, which were based on community standards, because the definition of community and the definition of its standards changed.

Largely thanks to these cases, queer literature of all kinds can be published and distributed in the United States.

While many people are arguing about the problems with visual depictions of graphic violence, we remain a culture obsessed with regulating sex. Sex, not violence, is why books are banned, why movies receive ratings that make them unmarketable, why albums are censored. Furthermore, the censorship tends to backfire. What happens when big artists are banned? Lawsuits and lots and lots of people interested in what all the fuss is about. Consequently, the reason for banning is completely reversed in the result of the ban. Think of what happens when a book is banned from a high school library - teenagers run out to read it. Banning all porn will only create (a) a greater demand, (b) an even less regulated and more abusive industry, (c) the joining of the current "soft" legal market with the truly violent and abusive "hard" illegal market.

The anti-pornography feminist movement is aligned with fundamentalist conservatives in their work to ban pornography. Only through the loose language of "community standards" can these two groups work together, each one hoping to prevail morally in defining those standards over the other. Yet after twelve years of Reagan-Bush appointees to all levels of the court system, which group's definition of community standards do you think would prevail? The silence that will come about should a community standards based anti-pornography statute become law will be deafening in comparison to the silences caused by some kinds of pornography.

Yes, some pornography does work to oppress and silence - whether one is thinking in terms of gender, sexuality, race, ability, or class. But, certainly, queer produced porn works to open up voices, to positively affirm in very powerful images that queer sex is okay. Furthermore, these images can transmit very powerfully the importance of latex love in a way usually lacking in het porn. However, a ban or a boycott of porn will inevitably mean silencing queer porn and its two major, liberating effects. I inherently mistrust activists making pitches that will limit my sexuality, my political identifications, my speaking. I wonder about these feminists who argue for banning porn; I wonder how their

ARTISTS WHO HAVE BEEN BANNED:

OLD FRIENDS
by Jonathan R. Carr

It's such a hard decision. I've been mulling it over for weeks - months - weighing all the arguments, but I just can't bring myself to do it. It seems so cruel. Would she know that I was only acting out of love? Would she know that I would rather live with her memory than see her suffer so? What right do I have to decide whether she lives or dies? She's God's creature. He should judge when her time has come; not me.

She's been here longer than I have. She was sitting on the porch the day I arrived, acting as if she owned the place, and I didn't argue. She sauntered right in, curled up on the sofa, and made herself at home. We've been together ever since; an old woman and a cat, passing the days in quiet contentment.

She used to be so pretty; bright blue eyes and such soft, silky grey hair. I decided to call her Silky, and if she had another name, she didn't seem to mind. She washed herself every day until she gleamed, and I loved the soft feel of her against my cheek as we lay curled up on the sofa each night; she with her yarn and I watching the flames lap at the logs in the fireplace.

Time passed so easily that I hardly noticed the stiffness creeping into her walk and the white film edging into her eyes, but they were there - slowly turning each day from a pleasure to a struggle.

Now the poor thing can hardly make it up the porch steps when she comes in from doing her business, and she often gets sick and throws up. Sometimes she even soils the bed. Her silky grey hair is now matted and dull, and little clumps are falling out here and there. I know her teeth must hurt her terribly, for she barely touches her food and her ribs are painfully clear.

She has her good days, though; days when she seems to take an interest in the world passing outside the window, days when she seems almost to understand what I am trying to tell her. But they are outnumbered more and more by the days when she does little more than sit by the window and sleep, her ball of yarn forgotten at her side.

It's selfish, really, wanting to keep her here with me. I look into her rheumy, faded grey eyes, and I almost think I feel her pleading with me to help end the pain, but I can't. I don't want to be alone. When she is gone, I'll have no one, and that is more horrible than living with soiled bedding and vomit on the floor.

But as I reassure myself with all the rational arguments for my cowardice, one thought - more compelling than all the rest - refuses to be silenced. A thought expressed in one word.

In 1987 a group of people banded together to do whatever was necessary to help people with HIV disease to keep their pets for as long as possible. This was the beginning of PAWS, a nonprofit volunteer organization.

Charles Wynott and Jon Piefer are currently forming a Maine chapter of PAWS. They spoke with APEX April 9.

APEX: Tell me about PAWS.
Charles Wynott: We are trying to help people who have HIV or AIDS keep their animals. Our major thing is to make sure (1) that their animals are taken care of by the vets and kept up-to-date on their shots, and (2) to keep them fed. And help people who can’t do things like change their fish tank or clean their birdcage.

APEX: What happens if the pet owners have to be hospitalized?
CW: We do short-term adoptions. We’ll have people who will pet sit the animals either at their place or go in on a daily basis to people’s homes and feed the animals, and walk them or whatever.

On a long-term basis we’ll have permanent adoptions set up where, if somebody does pass away or have to go to a nursing home where pets aren’t allowed, somebody will volunteer to be an adoptive parent.

A lot of people think way in advance with this disease, and they worry about their animals before they worry about themselves. And if they’re not set on where their animals are going if something happens to them, they won’t comfortably pass on. You need to reassure that person that their animals are going to be loved and taken care of up until and after they die.

APEX: How are you funded?
CW: Basically, we run the organization with donations of pet food and veterinary services. We’re hoping a lot of vets will give us up to 50% discounts on their services, and that’s where monetary donations will have to kick in - for the other half of the client’s bill.

APEX: Have any vets agreed to help?
CW: Well, we just sent out the letter a couple of days ago to every Portland vet listed in the phone book, and we’ve already gotten one positive response. We’re also asking pet supply stores and feedstores for donations and discounts. The AIDS Project has helped us tremendously with the duplication of our brochures and all of the stationery and the office stuff. They realize that at least 50% of people with AIDS or HIV have animals, and most of those people have a difficult time with finances. There are plenty of support systems for people with HIV and AIDS and that’s great; what we’re trying to do is ease up the pressure on those organizations by directing our efforts just toward their animals. Then all the other energy can go toward making sure the person is taken care of. There are two whole different sets of lives here.

So that’s what our main goal is, and I think it’s going to work real well. We’re going in through the back door. We’re kind of educating people on HIV and AIDS-related issues through animals.

APEX: What prompted you to start the Maine chapter of PAWS?
CW: Basically, we lost a cat. We had to put a cat to sleep. It had leukemia. We didn’t have enough money to get him a leukemia shot, so we postponed it. If you have HIV or AIDS and you have to put a pet to sleep, it’s traumatic. If Jon and I hadn’t had each other... We still were torn. It was like a family member. We called around and found that there were no support systems set up. So we had to do something to fill that void. We looked around and researched it and found the best organization was PAWS, based in San Francisco. We called Pornography is a place where reality and fiction dangerously mingle. Very real are the documented cases of women being abused in order to create pornography. Very real are the documented cases of women being abused in order to replicate pornography. Still, the idea of pleasure remains at the very center of selling and buying pornography. The click of the camera, the whirl of the film or video, is it real or is it memorex? Pleasure is the mask that the objectified woman and the masturbating man is forced to wear. Pornography, as it is produced and marketed through the veils of twentieth century technology, is both fiction and reality. The confusion between the two is at the very root of the violent abuse of women.

Whether we are men or women, we all know the look on a woman's face. It's on the cover of vogue, in beer commercials, in the pages of playboy - what is that look? It is the look of someone selling themself, convincingly, to a camera, and de-facto, to the gazes of hundreds of millions of consumers. Is it real, that look? The question seems irrelevant in the frenzy of selling and buying which it provokes. It is, in fact, that look which we are buying, which we are selling. It is a very real commodity.

But in terms of truth, honesty, and intimacy nothing could be more false. Are you buying or are you selling? Perhaps our culture has no other means of gauging truth. In those rare moments when we are not selling and we are not buying, we may have the opportunity to experience actual human emotions. But in our culture, that moment will pass like a headache in the night. Someone will try to buy, even if you're not selling. They'll make you. Maybe you'll pretend that you like it. Maybe you'll forget that you're pretending.

With the help of technology, the boundaries between fiction and reality have been shrinking at a radioactive pace. "Reality" has become a commodity, to be packaged, to be advertised, to be bought and sold. Whether it's the Rodney King beating, Fox's series of real life cop shows, the Nancy Kerrigan-Tonya Harding soap opera, the evening news, or footage from an F-16 destroying an enemy target, the video camera has facilitated a total breakdown of the boundaries between (a) representation and reality.

The consequences of this technological convergence are profound. They are transformative. With the new video verite our understanding of reality becomes forever fused with the modes of representation which surround us. They are the same - the event and what we are consuming. The event is as real as our consumption of it - there is no difference. At the root of such a profound moment in our construction of reality, lay pornography, a naked woman, her ass in the air, her fingers in her cunt, and her face groaning with pleasure. The image is as real as our consumption of it, as our gazing at it, as our describing it.

on new meaning and urgency as a place to hide a person with AIDS in a world of people without AIDS.

Since before my own first diagnosis in 1986 to the time I began my journey home five years later I had come to know many people with AIDS. From close friends to acquaintances, I have seen many die. Too many to count. If life has shown me the greatest tragedy, the greatest sadness that this plague has or would ever bring, and I believe it has, I have seen in the eyes of those who had no home to return to, no one who wanted them. They died alone, pariahs to their time.

I have long felt that I was one of the more fortunate ones in this disease or this "war" as Paul Monette so appropriately calls it in his Borrowed Time. From the very beginning of my illness in 1986, my family has pleaded with me to come home, come back to Maine. My family - in particular, my parents and my brothers and their families - has always been an important part of my life, of me. Since even before my return in 1991, their love has been at the very core of the strength that has sustained me through the most difficult and challenging times with this disease. For that I am very fortunate and grateful. It has never been a question of whether I would come home, but rather a question of when and how.

I came home in the spring of 1991, when the two most important reasons for staying in DC, job security and the ever so crucial health insurance that came with it, were no longer mine, taken away from me, and never to be mine again. That was cold, it was brutal, but now I was free to take that journey home for which my soul had long yearned.

I was born and raised in a very loving and very catholic and very French-Canadian family in a very catholic and very French-Canadian mill town community in Maine. At the age of 18, I left it for the first time, then, to go to college. At the age of 40 I came back as a gay man with AIDS. I am Leon. This is the beginning of the story of my journey home.

Ed. Note: This is the first installment of a series.
may have left with your readers about P-FLAG, its mission and its activities. We are a 13-year-old grass roots organization with more than 350 chapters in 48 states and 10 other countries, and a membership of more than 25,000 families. Through regular monthly support meetings we hope to preserve families in loving relationships. By educating ourselves and the ill-informed public about homosexuality we work to change attitudes of society towards our gay, lesbian and bisexual children and friends. Some of us become advocates for full civil rights for all gay, lesbian and bisexual people. We can’t do this work without the cooperation of all organizations and people who work for understanding and equality.

Our membership is open to everyone who shares our goals, and includes both gay and non-gay people. P-FLAG was proud to work with NH’s Coalition to End Discrimination and many other organizations, gay and straight, to push for the anti-discrimination legislation that passed the NH House of Representatives earlier this winter with a majority of more than 90 votes.

We don’t presume to know how gay organizations should be running their movement for equal rights. But we do feel privileged to have been included in the fight.

And I believe we have a good working relationship with Seacoast Gay Men. Over the years we’ve provided programs for their weekly meetings, and list our support meetings in their monthly newsletter calendar. So it was a big surprise to read Stan Clough’s article with the negative quotes in it about P-FLAG. A seasoned journalist would have tried to reach us, and some of the other organizations who took the hit, to hear our responses to Santerre’s remarks.

This is no time for sensational news stories about division between organizations whose common goal is to achieve civil rights for gays and lesbians. Our efforts are already challenged by churches and by those who believe gays/lesbians should continue to be discriminated against. Stories like "Voices From the Working Class" work against us all.

sexuality was affirmed and developed, if they grew up in isolated areas, if they’re thinking about us queers at all. I am reminded of the feminist/lesbian sex wars, which supposedly took place and were settled in the mid-to-late Eighties. What kind of sexual/gender revolution is it that supposes to set up new/old sexual mores?

Arguing for a ban on pornography really does open us up, as feminists, as queers, as women, as people of color, as all the groups that still inhabit the margins, who still don’t have a cohesive community voice to support our community standards, to attack and suppression. We live in a culture that continues to see people of the same sex kissing as obscene - witness the dispute over airing the two "infamous" Roseanne episodes - let alone the kind of sexual play hets are allowed to see plenty of pictures of (and not just in porn films and magazines). Girlfriend, if you think porn produces silence now, just wait until our tongues are torn out and our lips sewn together by the legislation anti-pornography feminists are pushing.

Dignity.
Are we not entitled to end our life in the same manner in which we led it? If we choose to die before becoming a pitiable shell, is it not our right? The right of all creatures?
Yes.
And even as she struggles up the stairs each night to our bed, refusing to relinquish her last illusion of independence, so should she be allowed the integrity of a dignified death.
It’s decided, then. But how to help her? There aren’t many options available. It has to be quick and as painless as possible, and plausible. I wouldn’t want any lingering questions.
The stairs. She’ll be getting up soon and coming downstairs for her breakfast. A fall down the stairs would work. What else can I do? I love her.
And after they’ve taken her body away, I’ll be alone, but not for long. I’ll miss her terribly, and it won’t be the same, but I’m sure someone else will let me live with them.
After all, who could resist an orphaned cat?

ASK THIGHMASTER - advice with holes

Dear Thighmaster,

I'm a newly out lesbian who has only been involved in one same-sex relationship. Recently, I was at a benefit where a British comedian did a whole routine on sex toys. She contended that all American lesbians arrive at a date with a backpack full of silicon, latex, and batteries. Thighmaster, I must admit I am intrigued. But when I hinted my interest to my lover, she quickly said that she doesn't need artificial assistance, and made me feel ashamed for asking. I'm appealing to your considerable experience - is it true about U.S. dykes and is it wrong?

Shopping for Pleasure

Dear Shopping,

Thighmaster, of course, will neither confirm nor deny having considerable personal experience with the backpacks of U.S. dykes. You seem to be presuming that Thighmaster is some kind of dyke slut. Don't. Thighmaster is hardly perturbed by the slut allegation, but what makes you think you know Thighmaster's sex or gender? It's true that Thighmaster, for some unknown reason, gets a disproportionate amount of mail from dykes. More mysteriously still, it seems to be mostly butch dykes who are clamoring for entry into Thighmaster's mental crevices. But has anything ever been stated in this column about the sex toys Thighmaster came with at birth? No, and nothing ever will be stated for the same reason that Thighmaster does not make personal appearances - a reason so obvious that Thighmaster will not bother to explain it.

Thighmaster will, however, answer your questions. You don't need "considerable experience" or even a gaping chyck hole to know whether all U.S. dykes arrive at a date with a backpack full of sex toys. You just need a sex-toy price guide and the business section of any newspaper - if, that is, you're lucky enough to need to read about the "recession" or the long history of economic discrimination against women in order to know about it. A backpack full of sex toys is no cheap thing, and even fewer dykes than the few of the past are rolling around in disposable cash these days. It's not using sex toys that's wrong. Your lover needs to get over her idea that sex toys are only for the sexually impaired. (You can help her by making it clear that you're highly pleased without them. Before you bring this up again, spend a few weeks screaming a little louder, acting a little more exhausted when it's over, etc.; if she's really insecure, you might even pretend to pass out a few times.) And it's not even so wrong to forget that the backpack is not a required dyke accessory: it's nothing but your loss if you write off as unlikely prospects the owners of fem purses, punk lunch boxes and the occasional well-stocked briefcase. What is wrong is walking around thinking that dykedom is composed of monied dykes running from date to date with good jobs, good health, no dependents, and enough food to eat. Thighmaster hates to harp on this issue when talking about sex is much more fun, but before you charge up your Visa with a backpack full of sex toys, you need to consider this: let's say that you're a dyke (or anyone else) who's poor, and who's also living with cancer, or AIDS, or some other medical condition that requires extensive and expensive treatment. In Maine, Medicaid won't help with the tab until you've spent everything on it except for $390 of your monthly income. With what's left, you probably can't afford to buy an extra cucumber to slip into your condom, not to mention those silicon marvels - and, by the way, the food stamp powers don't care if you've spent all but $390 on meds, so if you started out higher than their too-low cutoff point they won't be helping you buy your cucumbers, either. And, as too many people can tell you from personal experience, this is only one scenario for how you might wind up with what is euphemistically termed "insufficient funds."

So, if you've stashed away cash for a bagful of sex toys, think about redoing your budget. Activate some of your pleasure bucks for social justice instead, and stretch your remaining toy funds - minus the amount you spend on latex barriers, on which you should never ever skimp - by going for some cheap thrills. Buy just a few things. Thighmaster suggests that you go for a garden variety vibrator; it doubles as a dildo, and if you're not mechanically inclined, you could wheatpaste every major city off I-95 in less time than it would take you to learn how to build one yourself. For some of the other stuff, try making your own. Granted, there's a particular zing of pleasure that comes from using those beautifully crafted leather restraints, and leather workers deserve to make a living, too. But do you really need complete sets to suit every mood - wide or thin, buckle or velcro? Check out your local sewing store, which, Thighmaster guarantees, will be brazenly displaying a shockingly large variety of inexpensive tie-up materials thinly camouflaged as "notions" (which, of course, you're going to use with constant vigilance against cutting off circulation). Then, after you've unknotted your imagination, think hardware and groceries. Even if your lover doesn't come around for a while, your household chores will be much more pleasant.

Thighmaster eagerly awaits your submissions. No problem too complicated or twisted! Thighmaster, c/o Phoenix Press, PO Box 4743, Portland, ME 04112.
