Historical Note

Equal Protection/Portland (EP/P) was a volunteer organization formed in Portland, Maine in 1992 that campaigned to uphold a Human Rights Ordinance passed by Portland's City Council.

The Human Rights Ordinance was drafted and introduced by Portland City Councilor Peter O'Donnell in April of 1992 after 10 hate crimes were perpetrated against homosexuals in Portland in the space of a year. The City Council passed the Human Rights Ordinance on May 12, 1992 by a 7-1 vote, however conservative groups in Portland petitioned to bring the ordinance to a referendum vote in the November 1992 election. Led by James Duran, a member of the Christian Civic League of Maine, the petition drive began hours after the ordinance passed. A group calling itself Concerned Citizens of Portland took up the "Vote Yes" to overturn the ordinance campaign, while EP/P championed the "Vote No" campaign. The two groups held three heated public debates over the issue. Ultimately the ordinance was upheld with a 19,643 to 14,770 vote on November 3, 1992.

The Portland campaign garnered national attention from publications such as the New York Times and Newsweek magazine, in a year that was contentious for LGBT issues around the country. Gay rights figured prominently in a presidential election for the first time in the 1992 race between Bill Clinton and George Bush, and the election of Bill Clinton, who advocated for gay rights during his campaign, was seen as a victory by gay rights advocates.

At the same time in Tampa, Florida, voters approved a referendum that repealed the city's gay rights ordinance, while in Colorado, "Amendment 2" was proposed and approved, which prohibited any community in the state from passing laws protecting the civil rights of homosexuals. The amendment was eventually overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Information about the Florida and Colorado campaigns helped inform EP/P's campaign, as did a campaign in the state of Oregon, where a conservative group, the Oregon Citizen's Alliance

(OCA) proposed a state constitutional amendment opposing LGBT rights, known as Ballot Measure 9. The proposed amendment sought to add exclusionary language (a first for state constitutional amendments since the Civil War) disallowing sexual orientation from having civil rights protection. It also aimed to require government agencies and schools to set a standard that homosexuality is “abnormal, wrong, unnatural, and perverse,” which would have applied to educational institutions from kindergarten through colleges, and censored content in public libraries. The amendment was rejected by voters.
